Definition and Criteria of 4th Quarter Comebacks

Understanding how many 4th quarter comebacks have occurred requires a clear definition of what constitutes a comeback in the fourth quarter. Generally, a fourth quarter comeback is recognized when a team trailing at the start of the fourth quarter manages to take the lead and win the game by the final whistle. This entails overcoming a points deficit, regardless of the margin, during the last quarter of play. The NFL officially tracks these statistics, distinguishing between "fourth quarter comebacks" (4QC) and "game-winning drives" (GWD), which may overlap but have subtle differences.

To qualify as a 4QC, the team must be behind on the scoreboard when the fourth quarter begins and end the game in the lead. This includes games decided in regulation time only and excludes overtime scenarios unless the comeback spans regulation and overtime with the deficit present at the start of the fourth quarter.

Distinction Between 4QC and Game-Winning Drives

While often used interchangeably, a game-winning drive specifically refers to a scoring drive in the fourth quarter or overtime that puts the team ahead for good. A 4QC encompasses the broader scenario where the team erases a deficit from the start of the fourth quarter, which may involve multiple scoring drives or defensive stops leading to the comeback.
