Origins and Historical Background of La Catrina

The figure of La Catrina originated in early 20th century Mexico, created by Mexican illustrator José Guadalupe Posada and later popularized by artist Diego Rivera. La Catrina serves as a satirical symbol representing death, social class, and the universality of mortality. This iconic skeletal figure dressed in elegant European attire embodies the Mexican tradition of confronting death with humor and acceptance. Understanding the origins of La Catrina is essential to appreciating how la catrina troy connects with this rich cultural legacy.

The Creation by José Guadalupe Posada

José Guadalupe Posada, a Mexican printmaker, created the original image of a female skeleton dressed in an upper-class hat to critique the pretensions of the Mexican elite before the Mexican Revolution. This image was a clever social commentary that highlighted the inevitability of death for all classes. Posada's La Catrina was not originally named "Catrina" but was later given this name by Diego Rivera.

Diego Rivera's Influence

Diego Rivera immortalized La Catrina in his famous mural "Dream of a Sunday Afternoon in Alameda

Park,” where she appears as a central figure. Rivera’s work helped cement La Catrina as a cultural icon representing the Mexican Day of the Dead (Día de los Muertos) celebrations. The figure symbolizes the blending of indigenous and European cultural influences present in Mexican identity.
