Historical Overview of LSU Women's Basketball Coaching

The history of past LSU women's basketball coaches reflects the broader evolution of women's collegiate sports and the increasing prominence of women's basketball in the NCAA. Since the program's inception, LSU has employed a variety of coaches who laid the foundation and subsequently built upon it to elevate the team to national competitiveness. Early coaches faced challenges related to limited resources and recognition but were instrumental in establishing a competitive team. Over time, the coaching role at LSU evolved to demand greater strategic expertise, recruiting acumen, and the ability to cultivate talent capable of competing at the highest levels.

Understanding the timeline and progression of LSU women's basketball coaching provides context for the program's achievements and challenges through the decades. Each coaching era contributed uniquely to the program's identity and success.

Notable Past LSU Women's Basketball Coaches

LSU women's basketball has been guided by several influential coaches whose tenures have left a lasting mark on the program's history. Highlighting these key figures helps illustrate the program's trajectory over the years.

Jinks Coleman (1975-1979)

Jinks Coleman was among the earliest coaches of LSU women's basketball, leading the program during its formative years. Her leadership helped establish the team's competitiveness within the Southeastern Conference. Coleman focused on building a strong foundation, emphasizing fundamentals and teamwork, which would serve future coaches well.

Barbara Swanner (1979-1982)

Barbara Swanner took over from Coleman and continued to develop the program. Her coaching tenure was characterized by efforts to enhance the team's regional reputation. Swanner worked to increase recruitment reach and improve the squad's competitive results in the SEC.

Judy Johnson (1982-1984)

Judy Johnson's time at LSU was brief but important for bridging the gap between early program development and the more competitive era that followed. Johnson's coaching style emphasized defensive intensity and athleticism, setting the stage for future success.

Carol Ross (1984-1997)

Carol Ross is widely recognized as one of the most successful past LSU women's basketball coaches. During her 13-year tenure, she transformed LSU into a nationally respected program. Ross led the Tigers to multiple NCAA tournament appearances and SEC titles, securing her legacy as a cornerstone figure in LSU women's basketball history. Her coaching emphasized discipline, skill development, and a fast-paced style of play.

Pokey Chatman (1997-2007)

Pokey Chatman succeeded Ross and continued to elevate the program's national profile. Under her leadership, LSU made several deep NCAA tournament runs, including an appearance in the Final Four. Chatman was known for her strategic coaching and strong recruitment, bringing high-caliber players to Baton Rouge.

Bob Starkey (Interim Coach, 2007-2008)

Bob Starkey served as interim head coach following Chatman's departure. Though his time as head coach was limited, Starkey helped stabilize the team during a transitional period and prepared the foundation for the next long-term coach.

Nikita Lowry Dawkins (2008-2010)

Nikita Lowry Dawkins led the team with a focus on rebuilding and player development. Despite a challenging win-loss record, her tenure contributed to maintaining program continuity and competitiveness in the SEC.
